

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Acknowledgments frequently reveal the dialectic between structure and contingency, and mine are no different. This book was certainly written in circumstances existing already, given and transmitted from the past, but was shaped in innumerable ways by the people whose paths I crossed along the way. Earliest thanks go to the late Patricia Bontempi, who was hired to teach Spanish for the first time ever at my tiny public high school in far northern New Hampshire. She not only taught me the Spanish language and my first lessons in Latin American history; she provided resources my own family didn't have to take me on my first trip to New York City to interview at colleges and took me abroad, to Spain, for the first time. My entire subsequent career can be traced to her classroom, and I am deeply grateful for her teachings. Thanks to Señora Bontempi and the Pell Grant program, I ended up at Barnard College, where Elisabeth Jay Friedman taught me about Latin American politics and social movements and put up with my teenage angst. I am profoundly lucky to still call her a mentor. With the financial support of a Truman Scholarship, I enrolled at Columbia School of International and Public Affairs and learned a great deal about how I didn't want to study the world. I was fortunate, however, to travel to Cuba and El Salvador to study, and to have the guidance of Eric Hershberg, who has been a mentor not only at Columbia but later at the Social Science Research Council and then at the North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA) and beyond. My five years as the executive director at NACLA were foundational to my intellectual development, not least because of the incredible community of scholars I was introduced to, including those people who would go on to be my mentors at New York University. Thank you to everyone who has sustained NACLA and kept it alive for all these years.

Research for this project was supported not only by the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences and Department of History at NYU, but also by the Barnard College Alumnae Association, the Social Science Research Council, the History Project of Harvard University and the Institute for New Economic Thinking, the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations, the American Council of Learned Societies and the Mellon Foundation, the Conference on Latin American History, and a Frances R. Lax Award for Faculty Development at Rowan University. Crucial writing and research time was afforded by a fellowship from the Weatherhead Initiative on Global History at Harvard University. I am grateful for the generosity of these institutions. At Johns Hopkins University, Terri Thomas and Jessie Albee have provided invaluable support for both my research and teaching, for which I owe them deep thanks.

Tremendous thanks are also due to the archivists and librarians who aided in compiling the evidentiary base for this book. My sincere gratitude to the staff at the Archivo Histórico Genaro Estrada at the Secretaría de Relaciones Exteriores de México, especially Jorge Fuentes, Agustín Colín Huitron, and Mercedes de Vega, and to staff at the Colegio de México, especially Citlalítl Nares Ramos and Graciela Salazar in Víctor Urquidí's office. Additionally, many patient and knowledgeable archivists and librarians aided in my research at the Biblioteca Lerdo de Tejada, the Centro de Estudios de Historia de México, the Archivo General de la Nación, the National Archives and Records Administration in College Park, the National Archives of the United Kingdom, and the League of Nations Archives in Geneva, as well as at the FDR Library, the University of Texas Benson Latin American Collection, the Seeley G. Mudd Manuscript Library at Princeton, and the libraries of Columbia and Harvard Universities. In addition, many thanks to Raúl Gutiérrez Lombardo at the Centro de Estudios Filosóficos Políticos y Sociales Vicente Lombardo Toledano in Mexico City for his permission to use the image that graces the cover, to Daniela Spenser for the introduction, and to Joshua Everett at the Johns Hopkins libraries for his assistance in tracking down the physical copy of the magazine Futuro from which it is taken. I am also grateful for the careful research assistance of Diana Ávila Hernández in Mexico City.

My friends, colleagues, and comrades in graduate school were an incredible scholarly and activist community who shaped this work in so many ways. Extra thanks go to my cohort-mate and longtime collaborator Josh Frens-String, who has been an intellectual interlocutor from the first, as well as his partner Abby Weitzman. So grateful to count you as family. Deep thanks to my comrades from history, sociology, and American studies at NYU for the long nights in the library, at the bar, and at the bargaining table: Eman Abdelhadi, Jennifer Adair, Hillary Angelo and Ray Daniels, A.J. Bauer, Natalie Blum-Ross, Michelle Chase, Greg and Laura Childs, Daniel Aldana Cohen, Andy Cornell, Jeanette Estruth, Thomas Fleischman, Joan Flores, Eva Hageman, Anasa Hicks, Aaron Jakes, Ebony Jones, David Klassen and Boyda Johnstone, Sara Kozameh, Emma Kreyche and James Gatherer, Marisol LeBrón and Jenny Kelly, Tyesha Maddox, Alex Manevitz, Aldo Marchesi, Mike McCarthy, Liz Mesok, Max Mishler, Tej Nagaraja, Manijeh Nasrabadi and Ashley Dawson, Rachel Nolan, Michelle O'Brien, Amaka Okechukwu and Matt Birkhold, Claire Payton and Jonathan Katz, Nathalie Pierre, Natasha Raheja, Gabriel Rocha and Miranda Firestone, Daniel Rodríguez and Susan Rohwer, Shelly Ronen, Zach Schwartz-Weinstein, Samantha Seeley, Ernesto Semán, Martin Sivak, Marcio Siwi, Anna Skarpelis, Carmen Solíz, Jonathan Michael Square, Shauna Sweeny, Geoff Traugh, Nantina Vgontzas, Katy Walker and Jen Wilson, David Waschsmuth and Esme Webb, Beatrice Wayne, and Natan Zeichner. What a privilege to have found myself in graduate school alongside all of you. In addition, the Latin Americanist crew from Columbia University and Yale University played a huge role in my intellectual formation. Thanks especially to Yesenia Barragan and Mark Bray, Manuel Bautista, Mike Bustamante, Fredy González, Taylor Jardno, Christine Mathias, Rachel Newman, and Elizabeth Schwall. Among my farther-flung colleagues and conference pals, I'd like to especially thank Aaron Benav, Danny Bessner, George Ciccariello-Maher, Vanessa Freije, Rebecca Herman Weber, Daniel Immerwahr, Jamie Martin, Nick Mitchell, Tore Olsson, Amy Offner, Thea Riofrancos, David Stein, Chris Taylor, and Simon Toner for their encouragement and friendship through the long process of research and writing.

A special word of thanks is due to my friends in the ciudad antes conocido como el D.F., especially Kimberly Nolan, who taught me everything I know about rifando y controlando. I was lucky too, to overlap there with Adam Goodman and Hilda Vázquez, who have become forever friends. Thanks also to my Narvarte crew, especially Gonzalo and Andrés, and to Tiana for the introduction, and to toda la banda chilanga: Yecatli, Fani, Violeta, Cheivi, Luis, Kuble, Blanca, Nadia, Tío, Dave, Abraham, Benjamin, and Roger, gracias a todos por los ensayos sin luz en Iztapalapa, las tocadas interminables en el Centro Histórico, y los mezcales incapables en Coyoacán. In London, thanks to David Madden and Rachel Gurstein for making their home such a sanctuary at a crucial moment of writing, and endless thanks to the UK punks who put us up, took us in, and showed us around on many research trips: Ola, Dana, Emmanuel, Nani, Carlos, Clint (on his sojourns), Louis, Elissa, Ralph, Belma, Ralf, and most of all Paco. Que viva la vida comunale, friends.

My mentors among the faculty at NYU, Yale, and Columbia taught me a great deal about the responsibilities of the scholar, not only to each other and our students but to the broader world. I am grateful for the mentorship during graduate school of Karl Appuhn, Sinclair Thompson, Gil Joseph and the late Patricia Pessar, John Coatsworth, Manu Goswami, Ada Ferrer, the late and dearly missed Marilyn Young, Steven Hahn, Alejandro Velasco, Molly Nolan, Jennifer Morgan, Neil Brenner, Andrew Ross, and Nikhil Pal Singh. My greatest scholarly debts are to the two people to whom I always turn for advice, Barbara Weinstein and Greg Grandin. Barbara's deep wisdom is matched only by her endless fount of encouragement. When I returned from my dissertation research in Mexico and asked her for writing advice, she said something that has stuck in my head ever since: "You have to ask yourself, as you write every sentence and paragraph: Why does anyone have to know this?" Barbara's rare combination of practicality and positivity has been a sustaining force for so many of us, and I am endlessly grateful to her. Perhaps my deepest intellectual debt is to Greg Grandin, who introduced me to the study of history. While I will never match his level of productivity, I strive to emulate his approach to scholarship, rooted in asking questions that matter not just in the literature but in the world. His unflagging support has been invaluable in this process, and I am eternally grateful for his faith in my capacity as a scholar.

In various conferences, seminars, and less structured discussions, I've shared the ideas in this book with Alex Aviña, Sara Babb, Jennifer Bair, Johanna Bockman, Barry Carr, Linda Hall, Christina Heatherton, Luis Herrán Ávila, Fabián Herrera León, Amie Kiddle, Alan Knight, Susan Gauss, Julian Go, Paul Kramer, Carlos Marichal, Noel Maurer, Dawn Paley, Vanni Pettinà, Vijay Prashad, Louise Walker, Andrew Zimmerman, and Eric Zolov, all great sources of inspiration, healthy skepticism, and advice. In addition, William Booth kindly shared some of his research on the Mexican Left with me. Eric Helleiner has been an endlessly gracious interlocutor, always sharing his work, providing constructive feedback, and allowing me to ride his intellectual coattails. Jürgen Buchenau, Thomas Field, and two other anonymous reviewers provided invaluable feedback on the manuscript, as did Margaret Chowning, and I am deeply grateful for their careful engagement. I have also been lucky to count on the friendship and intellectual engagement of Micol Seigel and the entire community of the Tepoztlán Institute for the Transnational History of the Americas. It was at Tepoz that I met the incomparable Kate Marshall for the first time and pitched her the idea for this book, and she has been a source of endless guidance and incredible patience throughout this long process. I owe my deep thanks to her and her staff, especially Enrique Ochoa-Kaup, at University of California Press. Additional thanks go to my developmental editor, Megan Pugh, who helped me trim an unwieldy mess of a manuscript into the book I wanted to write.

At Rowan University, I was welcomed and mentored by Bill Carrigan and Emily Blanck, Corey Blake, Kelly Duke-Bryant, Chanel Rose, James Heinzen, and Ed Kazarian, and I'm lucky to count them as colleagues. At Harvard, I was grateful for the support of Sven Beckert, as well as for the clear-eyed vision of Walter Johnson and Kirsten Weld and the comradeship of Quinn Slobodian. Thank you also to Naghmeh Sohrabi and Greg Childs at Brandeis for allowing me to participate in the Mellon-Sawyer Seminar in Comparative Revolutions. In the Baltimore School, one of the most important sites for learning I've encountered, my deep gratitude goes to my teachers Lester Spence, Joshua Clark Davis, Jessica Douglas, Kate Drabinski, John Duda, Nicole Fabricant, Keegan Finberg, Sara Fouts, Rob Helfenbein, Andy Hines, Ailish Hopper, Nicole King, Brandon Soderberg, Steph Saxton, and Baynard Woods. I'm honored to learn with you.

At Johns Hopkins, special thanks goes to my Latin Americanist co-conspirators, especially Casey Lurtz and James Lynch, Alessandro Angelini and Nicole Labruto, Bécquer Seguí and Ilil Benjamin, as well as Elizabeth O'Brien, Debbie Poole, Flavia de Azeredo-Cerqueira, Valeria Procupez, and Madga von der Heydt-Coca. Many thanks to the happy hour crew, without whom these first few years would have been unthinkable: Megan and Erem, Scot, Tom and Canay, Kyle, Carsten and Jess, Elanor and Patrick, Johannes and Zofia, Anicia and Steve, thanks for taking me in. The brilliant graduate students at Johns Hopkins have already taught me so much. Thanks to the participants of the Arrighi Seminar for reading the manuscript and offering your detailed feedback, and special thanks especially to Corey Payne, who read multiple drafts, and Luis Rodríguez, who helped me organize so much of my thinking about where this work fits across fields. A remarkable group of Hopkins faculty have held real interdisciplinary space for me: Bentley Allen, Jane Bennett, P.J. Brendese, Sam Chambers, Erin Chung, Nathan Connolly and Shani Mott, Jan Dutkewicz, François Furstenberg, Katie Hindmarch-Watson, Larry Jackson, Jessica Marie Johnson, Martha Jones and Jean Hebrard, Michael Kwass, Syd Morgan, Danny Scholzman, Todd Shepard, Robbie Shilliam, Lester Spence, and Vesla Weaver have all accepted me into their scholarly conversations as an equal. Thank you all. I am, of course, endlessly grateful to my colleagues in sociology, especially Rina Agarwala, Emily Agree, Joel Andreas, Katrina Bell McDonald, Ryan Calder, Stefanie Deluca, Ho-Fung Hung, Mike Levien, and Sasha White for their support and encouragement. I have no idea how to begin to repay the debt I owe Beverly Silver. She has deeply shaped my thinking in this book and beyond, and I'm so grateful for her mentorship and guidance.

Most important through these last few years, of course, has been my family, biological and intentional. My mother, Gail, was my first role model and made me in innumerable ways into the person I am. After she died during my second year of graduate school, I leaned hard on those who would bear my weight, and I thank so many for carrying me, in ways big and small. I am grateful to my brother Dan for his love, for his brilliance, and for bringing his giant brood into my life. I owe a great deal to mother's siblings, Rena, Beth, Meg, and John Gospodarek, and their families—without you all I would not have made it through those months and these years. I also want to thank Jane Marie Schrader for providing a home I can always turn to, and the late Mike Stoddard for sharing his wisdom and affection with me. He is greatly missed. My definition of family, though, encompasses a much broader set of people than those held close by blood or law, and centers especially on those who refuse to leave you behind even at your most broken. Matt Smith and Angela Gelso have provided endless sustenance. Margaret Wiatrowski and Anne Eller will always pick right back up with me, no matter how much time has elapsed. I'm so glad to call Holly Danzeisen, Erin Tomlinson, Renata Segura, Amy Withers, Kate Levitt, and Nick Wunder my council family. David and Libby McComb have been there, unquestioningly, whenever I needed them, to share a coffee or a meal or a stick-and-poke tattoo. Thera Webb stuck around when it might have been easier not to, and I hope she knows how much I appreciate it. Above all, Casey Hickey, Shannon Kearns, and Jill Hubley have been the women who have long grounded me and shaped me into the person I am, over many years and through many bad haircuts. I am endlessly grateful to them and to Ian, John, Elliot, Stephen and Mary, and Ramona, for welcoming me into their families, as well.

The center of my chosen family is Stuart Schrader, whose quiet kindness and deep brilliance have taught me a way of being in the world that seemed impossible before him. His patience has been inexhaustible, and I know that I have tried it. Stuart is my sharpest editor, my most important intellectual interlocutor, and my partner in every sense. I have learned more from him than any other scholar, as we have turned over our ideas together, sharpening their dull edges before charging out into the world with them. In moments of unsteadiness, in Brooklyn and Baltimore, Buenos Aires and Barcelona, I have been so lucky to reach out my hand and find his there. As we face a deeply uncertain future in which our itinerant life has come to a sudden and disquieting stillness, I am so grateful to ground myself in the stability of his presence, and to fight alongside him as we struggle toward the horizon of justice. Pa'lante.
